Summary Report

ADC-2006: Pandemic Preparedness

Medical graduates are on the front lines during pandemics, playing a crucial role in preventing and controlling the spread of infectious diseases. Preparedness ensures they are equipped with the knowledge and skills to manage public health crises effectively. Understanding pandemic preparedness enables medical professionals to respond quickly and efficiently to emerging health threats. This includes implementing containment measures, administering vaccines, and providing critical care. Medical professionals must communicate effectively with the public during pandemics. Preparedness training includes strategies for delivering clear, accurate information to prevent panic and ensure compliance with public health measures. Preparedness training helps medical graduates develop resilience, enabling them to cope with the high-stress environments and emotional challenges associated with pandemic response. It enables them to make informed ethical decisions, communicate clearly with the public, and collaborate across disciplines. Preparedness training also fosters resilience and a global health perspective, crucial for handling the complexities of pandemics. Ultimately, it strengthens health systems and ensures medical professionals are ready for future public health emergencies.

The Key resource person for this course was Dr. Arun, Assistant Professor, Department of Community Medicine and was supported by Dr Varun and MEU members.

The Program was conducted on 5.4.2021 to 9.4.2021 via Online mode for 50 students of III MBBS for 30 hours
